“Herald”

It was her own [ ] joy, something hard to maintain amongst her everyday life and everyday home, but that came about quite naturally given a little peace and space ; to wake up in a half-world of now and fiction. [ ] your characters live a bit, such that she could watch the busy street outside the coffee shop back in New-York and amongst the brunchers or businessmen catch a [ ] of open-backed trucks of the Imperial German Army load aboard fifty singing boys with their fifty singing rifles; such that amidst the rubber-soled sneaker pounding the wet sidewalk she'd catch a glimpse of ripped leather, bound round and round with rough cloth to keep what they could of the [ ] from between rotten and rotting toes.

For the rest of the summer she'd live between Ypres and Florida, a century apart, but not half in one world, half in the other - instead, fully in both, so that the smells of [ ] coffee and orange blossoms and two-stroke fumes of outboard motors would be the natural bodyguard of the shaking and [ ] of teenage boys, and the explosions of muds and guts would sit warmly alongside the fresh apricots, [ ], dropped into her natural yoghurt. She let her fear of death temper itself.

After arriving at the beach house late on Thursday night, Alice was too [ ] to eat. She tipped her cab driver handsomely, dumped her suitcase in the bedroom, unzipped the front pocket to [ ] her laptop. This she set up on the desk that had been pushed in front of the French windows, as she'd requested, ready [ ] start work first thing tomorrow morning.
